Some things come back without ever truly being the same. A thought, a memory, a gesture. We recognise them at once, and yet something has changed. Perhaps not in them, but in the way we listen to them.

This album was born from that idea.

Each piece takes shape from just a few elements: a figure, an arpeggio, a pulse, a short harmonic sequence. The material returns, insists, lets itself be recognised. Then, slowly, it begins to transform. A note shifts position, an accent moves, the harmony opens up, the register widens, a tension appears and fades away. Sometimes a melody emerges almost unannounced, as if it had always been hidden inside the repetition.

The motion can be continuous while the harmony seems almost still. The hands keep running, but time stays suspended. It is in this contradiction that the music finds its space: moving forward while remaining in the same place.

I did not try to build these pieces by constantly piling up new ideas. Instead, I tried to discover how many possibilities could live inside a single idea.

That is why repetition is never simply repetition. It is memory. It is waiting. It is transformation. What returns carries with it the trace of what happened before.

So the form grows from within: present, repeat, transform, expand, intensify, subtract, and finally return. But when the starting point reappears, it no longer holds exactly the same meaning.

Perhaps this is the true subject of the album: not change, but the perception of change. Because some transformations are almost invisible while they are happening. We only notice them when we return to the beginning and discover that what seemed the same is no longer so.

Everything returns. Nothing returns unchanged.

Everything returns.
Nothing returns unchanged.
